The death of a young girl leads Detective Chief Inspector Harper and Detective Inspector Bryant into a shadowy world of back street abortions, human organ transfers and surrogate women and girls. From that one death the trail leads them to hospitals and clinics that feed on the desire to survive by any means possible, where for the right amount of money, one can buy an organ that will hopefully help a loved-one survive. The origin of some organs from unwilling donors does not matter to the providers or the purchaser whose loved one is dying. While at another location, a woman is overjoyed to take possession of a new born baby she has adopted not knowing that that very same baby had been snatched leaving a mother who will spend her life grieving for her supposedly dead child. Then at another location another transaction occurs, and on and on as people's emotions are preyed on.

The people involved in this conspiracy reflect the whole of society because births and deaths are part of everyday life. The loose knit organization that developed to exploit the shortage of organs from both adults and children preyed upon the desire of people to live longer or have a child of their own. As the investigation continues, DCI Harper and his team become astounded at the business empire that stretches around the world supplying children and body parts to an ever increasing consumer base like it was clothing or furniture being sold.
