Mr. Justice Holmes Clara Ingram Judson

From the Foreword: In prehistoric times, when men began to live together in groups, they felt the need for simple rules to govern their behavior. These rules became tribal laws, and as the groups grew into larger communities, more laws were needed. To primitive peoples, tribal laws were extremely important, they were strictly kept, and those who broke the law were severely punished - often with death for what might seem to us a trifling offense. As society became more complicated, more laws were necessary. Thoughtful men knew that law was the force which held civilization together, and they strove to make wise and just laws.
